"Several eminene literary gentlemen urged tne publication of his letter soon after it was received by me. They believed it contained ions not to be found in his published writings, which would deeply interest his worldwide circle of readers; and they argued that all the circumstances went to show that Lord Macaulay himself could feel no aversion to its publication, Indeed, one well-known literary gentleman-a not unfamiliar acqueincance of His Lordship-entertained no doubt that the letter was intended for that express purpose. I did not feel certain that either of these conclusions was correct. I knew that immediate publication would subject the author to attacks which he might regard as annoyances. I thought that a prope, delicacy required me if I erred in the matter, to err on the safe side. I therefore positively declined to allow the latter to be read beyond a limited circle of friends, who were distinctly apprised that no allusions to it must go before the public.

I asked myself if it was probable or possible fame, uttered deliberate opinions on topics of public concern, which he would be unwilling to have submitted to the inspection and the judgment of posterity, and my conclusion was that the adoption of such a hypothesis would be an insult to his memoduct not alone to "triers of the vicinage," but to the countrymen of Lord Macaulay.

i will now place beyond eavil the fact that the opinions in regard to the institutions of the United States, expressed in his letter to Lie, of Mry 23, 1857, were deliberate ones.
